

Updated Statement on the Government's Disability Plan

The High Court have said the Government's disability plan (National Disability Strategy) is against the law.

We think this is the right decision.

This is because the way they involved people was not good enough.

There are lots of areas where people with disabilities and mental ill health have fewer chances.

These things need to change.

The survey about the Government's plan did not give people enough information so they could take part.

The survey was written in a way that meant people could not be properly involved in saying what they think.

This means it does not help change things for people with disabilities and mental ill health.

We hope the Government will do what the High Court have said and involve disabled people in making a new plan.

We look forward to a new plan that has been made together with disabled people and the organisations that support them.
